Cafés, coworking spaces & other welcoming places

A reason to say hello.

Could a short introduction make it easier for people who spend time in the same place to start a conversation?

An imagined moment at a café. These introductions are fictional.

A visitor shares an interest

Local walks

A short introduction they choose to share.

Someone notices common ground

Local walks

Something they might ask about in person.

The introduction gives them a starting point. Saying hello is still up to them.

Presence would give people a shareable introduction to themselves: interests, projects and whatever they want others to know. They would choose separately whether to be discoverable nearby.

Nearby discovery is still being investigated. This example shows the idea, not a working detection system or a trial result.

We're looking for places that would help us find out whether this is useful.

What we'd ask of your space

Introduce the idea to visitors. Tell us what feels useful, awkward or easy to ignore.

Your part

- Choose a natural place to introduce Presence—a website link, a QR code or a short mention.
- Let visitors decide whether to take part. Quiet visits should stay comfortable too.
- Share what you notice and what your visitors tell you.

What we would agree with you

- How to introduce Presence and explain the choices clearly.
- Who helps during the trial, what feedback is useful and how to stop.
- Any equipment and setup before you decide to take part.

You wouldn't need to organise events or offer discounts. The aim is to see whether a little context helps newcomers feel welcome and regulars find a reason to talk. That benefit still needs testing.

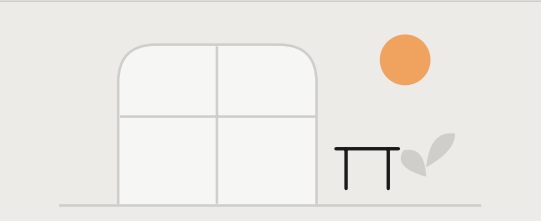

A shared table is one possible place to introduce the idea. Visitors should be free to talk or carry on with their day. Stock photograph; not a participating venue.

A space page you could share

An introduction to the place, and to what people might have in common there.

Fictional space-page example

Café · Example town

Common Ground

A neighbourhood café for reading, small projects and unhurried conversations.

Say hello about

What you're reading
Side projects
Local walks

An introduction to your place

A proposed page for your website, socials or a QR code in the space.

A few starting points

Topics give visitors something concrete to notice and ask about.

A separate choice

Sharing this page would not switch on anyone's nearby visibility. Local discovery would be optional and off by default.

What still needs working out

Automatic discovery without repeated check-ins is the ambition. Small Bluetooth beacons are one approach being investigated; hardware requirements, costs and accuracy are not confirmed.

Any equipment would be intended to be small and discreet. Our proposal is for Presence to supply it for early trials rather than ask hosts to buy a beacon. Supply and trial terms are not yet agreed.

The example above does not create a live venue page. Interest would not create a public listing.

Would this be useful here?

We'd like to hear about your place before proposing a trial.

- What already helps people feel welcome?
- Where might an introduction fit naturally into a visit?
- What would make you say no?

Tell us a little about your space.

Email us to start a conversation. Asking a question does not commit you to a trial or create a venue listing.

hello@meetpresence.com

Leah

meetpresence.com/spaces

Before a trial, we would agree how visitors' information is used, who handles questions, how long details are kept and how to stop. The website's signup forms are still non-collecting previews.

Starter edition · the scenario and Common Ground are fictional. The photograph is illustrative and does not show a participating venue.

Café photograph via Unsplash · Unsplash licence. Outfit: SIL Open Font License. Version 2 · October 2026.